The renovation of Camp Concert Hall was the final phase of the Booker Hall of Music renovation and included cosmetic updates as well as improved audio / visual systems and acoustics features.

The hall was named in honor of J. L. Camp, former Trustee whose family donated funds for the facility when it was first constructed as part of the Fine Arts Building which opened in 1968. The building was renamed Booker Hall of Music as part of the Modlin Center for the Arts which opened in 1996.

The renovation of Camp Concert Hall began in late spring 2019. The primary focus of this work was to upgrade the acoustics and the audio / visual systems of the hall. Cloth banners were installed throughout the hall that can be electronically raised or lowered to “tune” the space depending on the type of performance. All of the seats were removed and refurbished for re-installation. New flooring was installed throughout. The wooden stage floor was refinished and wooden walls were installed on both sides of the hall, creating hard surfaces for acoustic sound quality. Other improvements included replacement of the faux loggias with decorative arched panels, a redesigned backstage loading dock, and a new railing at the balcony. The entire hall, including the ceiling, was repainted. The Camp Concert Hall renovation was substantially complete in time for the first performance in fall 2019.
